

The new US investigations taint US-China trade talks

- The positive tone in financial markets faded somewhat after the announcement of the US's investigation of Chinese company Huawei for potential spying on US business partners (see), offsetting the positive effect of the announcement of further trade talks that will take place on 30-31 January between the US and China (see). Elsewhere, May managed to win the no-confidence vote (see), but the challenging context remained for her as she is now required to present a Brexit "plan B" next Monday (see).
- In this context, equity markets were mixed: US stocks were flat despite the release of Morgan Stanley's lower-than-expected fourth quarter earnings (see). Meanwhile, European equity indices showed little losses due to the threat of potential US tariffs on automobile imports from Europe (see), while Asian markets also ended lower amid trade fears.
- Sovereign core yields inched up, but still remained at very low levels. The US Treasury yield remained above the 2.70% level, while the 10Y Bund yield continued to approach 0.25% despite today's release of December's final inflation figures for the EZ which were in line with expectations (see).
- The USD was broadly steady despite the ongoing US government shutdown, which has now almost reached one month (see). Despite the uncertainties about Brexit negotiations and future relations between the UK and the EU, the GBP appreciated, while the euro remained below 1.14 USD/EUR. EM currencies depreciated across the board despite a stable USD. Moreover, the fall in crude prices despite the release of a fall in OPEC oil supply (see) added more pressure to Latam currencies.
