Investors await tomorrow's FOMC policy decision. Fed Preview

- Financial markets were steady ahead of tomorrow's FOMC meeting decision (see preview below), with markets pricing in a 94% probability of a 25bps rate cut.
- There were some mixed news flows on the trade front. A U.S. administration official said that a limited trade deal may not be completed for signing next month in Chile. Nonetheless, the U.S. is considering a 12-month extension of some tariff waivers granted to China in December last year.
- Regarding the Brexit news flow, the UK parliament is currently debating the elections bill calling for snap elections on December 12, although one of the amendments to the elections bill is discussing bringing forward the elections date to December 9.
- U.S. Treasury Secretary Mnuchin is open to loosening regulations that toughen liquidity rules for big banks to ease stress in short-term funding markets. Separately, today's Fed 14-days repo auction was 1.06 times over-subscribed (submitted $47.9bn, accepted $45bn), while the overnight repo was fully subscribed.
- European sovereign bond yields inched down, whereas UST bonds were steady (10Y GER - 2.2bps, 10Y US -1bps) as investors await tomorrow's FOMC decision and the U.S. 3Q19 GDP.
- FX showed minor changes. The pound strengthened slightly (GBPUSD +0.2%) after the main opposition party in the UK said it would back an early general election, which will take place between December 9 and 12. The GBPUSD 3M implied volatility trimmed yesterday's increase (-2%). The DXY index erased early gains led by an unexpected fall of U.S. consumer confidence in October (125.9, consensus 128, previous 126.3), while the euro appreciated slightly (EURUSD +0.1%) in light of Brexit developments. Moreover, EM currencies were mixed with the Chilean peso leading the losses (USDCLP -0.4%) as the turmoil continues.
- The S&P 500 continued to hit fresh record highs with defensive sectors outperforming others, while European stocks edged lower in general.

Fed preview

- At their October meeting, for the third time this year, we expect the Fed will lower rates by 25bps, as elevated trade uncertainty and weakening investment outlook continue to weigh on the committee's outlook.
- Markets have aligned with the October interest rate cut, but have lowered their expectations for an additional cut in December.
- The committee will likely remain split over how to approach future interest rate decision. The hawks, fearing that overly accommodative conditions could fuel financial instability, and the centrists, wanting to allow for time to evaluate the impact of increased accommodation, will likely support a pause. After fulfilling the "mid-cycle" adjustment, the doves, despite concerns that delaying rate cuts could jeopardize the current expansion, may support a temporary pause if trade tensions between the U.S. and China remain in abeyance.
- On the balance sheet, in an effort to disentangle the current efforts to replenish bank reserves with the stance of monetary policy, the committee will likely maintain its current policy course announced over the intermeeting period. However, we expect that options for addressing the uptick in money market volatility such as the scope of the reserve shortfall, the impact of liquidity and capital requirements, regulatory guidance, standing repo facility and the presence of regime changes in reserve preferences will be discussed at the meeting.
