Expectations of further Fed rate cuts boosts bond buying

- Risk-off mood prevailed in financial markets this week, with key volatility indicators (VIX and the MOVE) hitting near two-month highs amid a string of disappointing US activity data and worsening trade tensions between the US and Europe following WTO's ruling.
- On the data front, both manufacturing and non-manufacturing PMIs disappointed in September with the former contracting further unexpectedly. Today's release of US employment data were mixed. Non-farm payrolls grew at a slower pace than expected in September, but August's data was upwardly revised by 38k (136k, consensus 145k, previous 168k). Moreover, the unemployment rate fell in September from 3.7% to 3.5%, while average hourly earnings slipped, which poses a less rosy outlook for US consumption.
- Rising US growth concerns have raised market's expectations of Fed's interest rate cut in October (90% probability of a 25bps cut, rising from 50% last Friday), while the chances of an additional cut by year-end remain at 50%. Elsewhere, the market expects the ECB to cut the deposit rate by another 10bps next year.
- Sovereign bonds attracted fresh flows. Yields declined sharply in the US, with the yield curve steepening (US2TY -23bps, US10TY -16bps). European yields offered some resistance to decline, as Draghi stressed the need for fiscal expansion in the wake of the ongoing debate amongst the ECB's governing council about further stimulus (10Y German yield -1.5bps). Nonetheless, markets' long term inflation expectations slumped further hitting a new record low in Europe (to 1.13% -5bps). Peripheral risk premia were broadly steady (Spain 71bps, Portugal 72bps, Italy 141bps).
- Equity indices tumbled but clawed back some losses based on rate-cut expectations (S&P500 -1.1%, Eurostoxx -3%). Cyclical sectors led declines, including banks (-5% on average in the US and Europe). Cyclical commodities declined, and oil prices fell sharply hitting levels below pre-Saudi-attack levels (Brent -5% to $59 p/b), while precious metals acted as a safe-haven. Junk bonds spread increased.
- The US dollar weakened slightly (DXY -0.1%) due to growth concerns. Investors sought shelter in the JPY and the GBPUSD remained unchanged ahead of Boris Johnson's proposal for a Brexit deal. LatAm currencies gained (LACI index +1.3%), while the rest of the EM currencies showed minor changes, although the slowdown in the US poses a risk going forward.
- Financial strains in US repo markets moderated, although the SOFR rate inched up on September 30 (to 2.35%) due to the end of the quarter liquidity demand, it slid back to 1.84% during the week. The Fed reduced the liquidity injected into markets to 245bn (down from 440bn last week) in five overnight operations, which were fully subscribed, while it did not need to launch any 14-day repo facility. Mr. Clarida said the size of the Fed balance sheet will be discussed in the next FOMC meeting.
