

Market Comment

Quiet session ahead of trade developments

- Financial markets were broadly steady, although some caution lingers as investors await U.S.-China trade agreement progress. The Chinese delegation arrived in the U.S. to sign phase one of their trade deal on Wednesday. Furthermore, the U.S. Treasury department said on Monday China is no longer considered as a currency manipulator, adding that China has made “enforceable commitments” not to devalue its currency and agreed to publish relevant exchange rate information as part of the trade deal.
- On the data front: U.S. inflation increased less than expected in December (2.3% YoY; Cons: 2.4% YoY; Prev: 2.1% YoY), while core inflation remained steady at 2.3%YoY in December and in line with expectations. The negative surprise was driven by a decline in shelter costs and used car prices. On the other hand, China's trade balance unexpectedly rose in December ($46.79b; Cons: $45.70b; Prior: $37.62b revised from $38.73b) with a surprising increase in both exports and imports (where crude played a large role). Nonetheless, trade figures largely reflect base and price effects rather than underlying strength as the U.S.-China trade war eases.
- Sovereign yields inched down across the board, as U.S. inflation increased below expectations. Nonetheless, bond markets showed minor changes, awaiting the U.S. and China to strike the trade agreement tomorrow. Moreover, markets are also waiting for the release of the new repo schedule, following today's oversubscribed 14-D term repo auction (submitted $43.15b; maximum $35bn). The European yields also edged down marginally. Spain bond yields declined in line with German yields, although Spain's Tesoro 10Y syndicated bond registered a record demand.
- In FX markets, the CNY extended its appreciation below the CNYUSD 7 threshold, as the U.S. removed China from the list of countries considered currency manipulators. Meanwhile, emerging currencies showed minor changes.
- In commodities, oil prices increased trimming some of the recent losses bolstered by higher-than-expected Chinese foreign trade in December (see).
- Equity markets remained broadly unchanged, despite today's U.S. bank earnings publications exceeded expectations, except WFC.
