

Brazil | Changes in the BCB board, rather than interest rate cuts, are on sight

Enestor Dos Santos

The minutes of the previous monetary policy meeting showed that although concerns on inflation are declining, there is still no room for a monetary easing. We do not expect the Selic to be cut soon, but uncertainty is higher than usual as the vice-president Temer will likely assume presidential duties next week and a change in the command of the BCB is possible.

Lower concerns about inflation...

Today the minutes of last week's monetary policy meeting were released. As expected, they revealed that the Monetary Policy Committee (Copom) is now somewhat less concerned about inflation than it was in the recent past. Precisely, progress in the fighting against inflation was highlighted in some parts of the document ("The Committee acknowledges advances in the fight against inflation, especially in restraining second order effects of the adjustments in relative prices"). Moreover, the positive effect in inflation of the ongoing deceleration in labor markets was explicitly noted. In the same line, baseline inflation forecasts were revised downwards by the monetary authority. They now show that although inflation will remain above the 4.5% target this year, it will converge to that level by the end of 2017 (a view that we at BBVA Research share). Anyway, in spite of the more dovish tone of the minutes, they explicitly showed that a monetary easing is not yet an option ("...high annual inflation and inflation expectations distant from targets do not offer room for the easing of monetary policy" and "...the central scenario does not allow [the Copom] to work with the hypothesis of easing monetary conditions"). Finally, it is worth to mention that the Copom revealed to be more worried than before about the fiscal situation. In particular, it now regards fiscal policy as expansive, rather than as neutral as in the previous minutes.

... do not imply that the beginning of a monetary easing cycle is imminent

The monetary policy minutes brought no big news. They supported our view that a monetary easing should not be expected in the short-run. However, uncertainty regarding future monetary policy is now higher than usual as next week the Senate will likely accept to analyze the impeachment case, meaning that President Dilma Rousseff will likely have to step down for 180 days and Vice-President Michel Temer will assume presidential duties. In that case, he could decide to appoint a new president for the Central Bank of Brazil (BCB). Although a change in the command of the institution would likely be a hawkish event, there also exists the possibility that the new administration decides to formally concede independence to the monetary authority, which could help inflation expectations to ease and create some room for a monetary easing already this year.

This document has been prepared by BBVA Research Department, it is provided for information purposes only and expresses data, opinions or estimations regarding the date of issue of the report, prepared by BBVA or obtained from or based on sources we consider to be reliable, and have not been independently verified by BBVA. Therefore, BBVA offers no warranty, either express or implicit, regarding its accuracy, integrity or correctness.

Estimations this document may contain have been undertaken according to generally accepted methodologies and should be considered as forecasts or projections. Results obtained in the past, either positive or negative, are no guarantee of future performance. This document and its contents are subject to changes without prior notice depending on variables such as the economic context or market fluctuations. BBVA is not responsible for updating these contents or for giving notice of such changes.

BBVA accepts no liability for any loss, direct or indirect, that may result from the use of this document or its contents.

This document and its contents do not constitute an offer, invitation or solicitation to purchase, divest or enter into any interest in financial assets or instruments. Neither shall this document nor its contents form the basis of any contract, commitment or decision of any kind.

In regard to investment in financial assets related to economic variables this document may cover, readers should be aware that under no circumstances should they base their investment decisions in the information contained in this document. Those persons or entities offering investment products to these potential investors are legally required to provide the information needed for them to take an appropriate investment decision.

The content of this document is protected by intellectual property laws. It is forbidden its reproduction, transformation, distribution, public communication, making available, extraction, reuse, forwarding or use of any nature by any means or process, except in cases where it is legally permitted or expressly authorized by BBVA.